The tool is apparently designed to check a user's or site's HTML code against Google's list of abusive and abusive content. According to Google, the Checkbot will do this in just three clicks for every page visited. Google appears to be gearing up to counter rival and abusive content sites such as Fark and Phishtank. Google says that it's "especially interested in content that would be unlikely to be legitimate." The company has already been adding some helpful warnings to the abusive content it finds and appears to be working with a small group of volunteers to make sure the findings of the tool are quickly acted on by websites. Checkbot was debuted at the Web 2.0 Summit today with the launch of Google Docs. The company says Checkbot will also work with other sites and is at work on a way for websites to inform Google of abusive content directly. As for why it's called Checkbot, Google says it's related to Checkbot.org, an anti-phishing site that Google acquired in 2004. Google's previous attempt to mitigate phishing on the web, "Page Rank Checker," was never more than an experimental tool and didn't seem to have a wide adoption. Another recent Google attempt to control what it believes to be fraudulent use of its site, was its effort to control which results are shown when its site is used as a search term. That feature came out of its reported spying on visitors to certain sites, as reported by the New York Times. 2d92ce491b
