Hexavalent chromium induces a hypertrophic response in chondrocytes in vitro and in vivo. Toxic metals have been proposed to play a role in the pathogenesis of osteoarthritis. Toxic effects of metal ions are mediated via the formation of reactive oxygen species (ROS). However, few studies have focused on the effects of metal ions in cartilage. Here, we report that the hazardous metal, hexavalent chromium (Cr(VI)), significantly induced the proliferation of chondrocytes in vitro and that of chondrocytes and osteoblasts in articular cartilage in vivo. Cr(VI) induced hypertrophy with upregulation of numerous chondrocyte-related genes, including type II collagen (COL2A1), aggrecan (ACAN), and SOX9, in the absence of matrix metalloproteinase 13 (MMP13), which is a hypertrophic marker in chondrocytes. Treatment of chondrocytes with TGF- β 2 suppressed the Cr(VI)-induced upregulation of COL2A1, but did not influence ACAN or SOX9 expression, suggesting that the hypertrophic responses of chondrocytes were mediated by TGF- β 2 signaling, but not COL2A1. Cr(VI) treatment of mouse cartilage resulted in the phosphorylation of Smad2 and Smad3, and enhanced the crosstalk of Smad3 with Smad1/5/8. Furthermore, chromatin immunoprecipitation analysis revealed that Smad3 bound directly to the promoter regions of COL2A1, ACAN, d4474d7b8
