We investigated whether the resting activity of neurons in the primary somatosensory area of monkeys is different from that of the motor system. N1 neurons (20-40 ms) in the primary somatosensory area were identified. Their activity was recorded in awake monkeys using single unit recording and high-density microelectrodes. After the training of each monkey, the effect of passive movement of the forelimb on the activity of the recorded neurons was examined. The effect was classified into four categories: a) an increase in activity; b) a decrease in activity; c) no effect; d) a decrease followed by an increase in activity. N1 neurons did not respond to passive movement of the forelimb in 54% of the cases. We found that the resting activity of N1 neurons was related to the activity of the motor system. The activity of N1 neurons that did not respond to passive movement was markedly higher than the average activity of all N1 neurons. In contrast, the activity of N1 neurons that responded to passive movement was significantly lower than the average activity. These results suggested that the resting activity of N1 neurons is closely related to the activity of the motor system and thus may play a role in modulating the activity of the motor system.Q: Core data migration fails with this error I'm facing a weird migration error: Terminating app due to uncaught exception 'NS

In the recent past, corporate research on hospital management and management teams has brought increased attention to quality management. The total quality management (TQM) movement was an attempt to raise the quality of service to a new level. TQM and quality management (QM) are two different concepts that should be properly distinguished. The purpose of this article is to understand the concept of TQM, the theories on which it is based, and the methodology and practices of TQM. The article also examines the applicability and success of TQM in hospitals. Based on an evaluation of the literature, the author concludes that TQM is not a viable concept in hospitals.
