The End of (My) Food Writing As part of Food Chain's Week of Food Writing, I'm participating in a readalong of The End of (My) Food Writing, a collection of essays written by Michael Pollan, the writer and activist, in response to a letter he received from his father (who was diagnosed with Parkinson's Disease). One of my favorite food bloggers, Black Girl Eats, led this week's Food Chain readers with her review of the book. Following the end of my last food writing, I was ready to write a bit differently. In the past, I'd tended to write about food in terms of my personal relationship with it. My goal was to connect with the reader and to get him to see the food as I saw it. I wanted to be his confidante, and to share something interesting and maybe a little more than he might expect.

In my most recent essay, I wrote about food and wine in a personal way,
