Field of the Invention The present invention relates to the field of computer implemented techniques for automatically capturing one or more images of an item such as a document. Description of the Prior Art A search may be conducted online via a search engine, a site, or an application. For example, an online search may be conducted via a search engine, wherein the user enters one or more keywords and the search engine presents the results of a search for the keywords. The search engine may then present a link to a web page at a web site. The web page may be presented for the user to review. A search may also be conducted within an application, such as via a search feature of an online office suite. As an example, the user may enter one or more keywords in a word processing application, such as within a document or a spreadsheet. The search feature may present the results of a search for the keywords. However, if a user fails to capture an image of an item during an online search or in an office suite, the user may be unable to view the item or access information associated with the item. For example, if a user fails to capture an image of a newspaper article prior to leaving the office, the user may be unable to access the article and/or additional articles associated with the article.

[Clinical characteristics of parenchymatous lung diseases in children]. Analysis of the course and outcome of 882 cases of parenchymatous lung diseases in children has shown that primary pulmonary tuberculosis (82.9%) and phthisis (12.2%) are the most common. The frequency of parenchymatous lung diseases in children is on the rise; the number of children who had these diseases as well as the size of the endemic focus is growing; young children are most frequently affected by the diseases. A considerable number of cases of parenchymatous lung diseases in children are found to be misdiagnosed or diagnosed with a delay. Such cases require a high level of suspicion, detailed anamnesis, clinical and radi
