The effects of DBCP and chlorpropamide on gluconeogenesis from glycerol and lactate were examined in the isolated perfused rat liver. Both DBCP and chlorpropamide reduced the rate of gluconeogenesis from glycerol and lactate. On the other hand, the rate of pyruvate oxidation was accelerated in the presence of DBCP and chlorpropamide. In the presence of DBCP, a large dose of L-lactate (120 mM) failed to induce oxidative phosphorylation, while it induced a significant oxidative phosphorylation when co-administered with 100 microM chlorpropamide. DBCP (5.0 mM) induced a significant phosphorylation of 40S ribosomal protein S6 in the perfused liver, while chlorprop
