Delayed-onset Clostridium difficile infection after the SARS outbreak. This study aimed to analyse the frequency, management, and outcomes of delayed-onset Clostridium difficile infection (DC-CDI) associated with hospital-onset SARS. The study patients comprised 190 patients with SARS-associated hospital-onset CDI who were matched by age, sex, and interval from onset of SARS to the first onset of CDI to a control group of 192 CDI patients with community-onset CDI who had not been ill with SARS. In multivariate analyses, the time interval between the diagnosis of SARS and the onset of CDI was the only significant variable predictive of a higher incidence of DC-CDI (adjusted OR, 1.13; 95% CI, 1.01-1.26; P=0.03). DC-CDI occurred in 12.8% of patients with SARS and in 2.1% of patients with non-SARS CDI (P=0.003). Patients with SARS-associated CDI received shorter median (interquartile range) treatment courses than patients with community-onset CDI (3 [2-7] vs. 5 [4-7]; P=0.0002). Delayed-onset CDI is more common than expected among patients with SARS-associated hospital-onset CDI, and these infections have less favourable outcomes than those caused by community-onset CDI.
