In the synthesis of certain drugs, it is often desirable to have a solid-state pharmaceutical product that is not readily redissolvable in vivo. This may be the case when the drug is to be taken orally, when the drug is to be taken intranasally, when the drug is to be delivered into a body cavity such as the vaginal vault, the bladder, the intrauterine device (IUD), or the tissue near a body orifice, or when the drug is to be delivered in solid form via an injection, etc. It may also be desirable to have a solid pharmaceutical product that does not readily dissolve in blood, from which other drugs may be released. The term "solution", as used herein, refers to a fully disperse solid material, for example, a dried solid particulate or powder that has no readily discernable boundaries between its individual particulates. One common way to visualize this is to think of a "solution" as having the characteristics of a "soup", in which the individual particulates are suspended in a medium. The term "disperse", as used herein, refers to a solid material having some, but no substantial, tendency to separate into individual particulates in a solution. It is believed that the tendency to disperse is generally a function of the quantity of surface active material on the particulates, such that a greater quantity of surface active material tends to disperse the particulates, and cause them to separate from one another. The term "solid material", as used herein, may be taken to include a solution that is not dry, but rather, is at a certain minimum amount of moisture. The term "coumarin", as used herein, is taken to mean a chromophoric chemical
