Kinship Group The China Kinship Group (CKG) is a charitable organization founded in 2001 and based in San Francisco, California. In a series of workshops and training sessions, the group raises awareness about the dangers of children being trafficked into China's commercial child-marriage system. Through working to expose the commercial sexual exploitation of children in China, The China Kinship Group has been instrumental in passing legislation in California to help protect youth and young adult victims. History The China Kinship Group was founded in 2001 by Alan Dershowitz, whose sister had been smuggled into China as an underage bride. The China Kinship Group has provided financial and emotional support to countless families whose children have been trafficked into China for the purposes of marriage. One such victim, Lucie Wrobel, wrote an account of her experience in Surviving a Child Bride. The China Kinship Group also works to raise the visibility of the commercial sexual exploitation of children by providing support to grassroots and international organizations who provide holistic solutions to ending the exploitation of children. Through its Safe Return project, The China

Kinship Group has helped more than 70 underage women and girls return to the United States safely. The China Kinship Group has been a member of the InterAction Coalition since 2004. References External links China
