Periodic notifications can be used to display messages, for example: new messages in a mail client or a reminder message when the timer is started. When you have the program running, you will not be disturbed with the message. This is a very good way to remind you about important tasks, for example, when you have to send an email, when you have to deliver a document or when you have to go for a run. It is a very flexible solution and you can display as many notifications as you want with one timer. 3.

Copyright (c) 2008-2014 The Authors * * Notification Timer is released under the MIT License. * Please read the LICENSE.txt included with this program. * * * --> The Notifications Timer can display either an alert, or an announcement window, depending on which window type you choose. The alert window type is intended for use in situations where the program has to display a message to the user. For example, if the user tries to open a locked file, the Notifications Timer can display an alert message in an alert window. The announcement window type is intended for use in situations where the program needs to inform the user of something that is not so urgent. For example, if a user decides to close an application, the Notifications Timer can display an announcement window. The alert window type is by default set to a fixed message, while the announcement window type is set to a message with a flexible message text. The message text can be changed to make the messages more clear. This is accomplished by clicking the "Edit text..." button and entering the message text. The application remembers the last used message text and will use that text the next time Notification Timer is started. Thus, the user does not have to choose the message text every time the application is started. The start time of the message can be set for example to every half hour. The application will then display the custom message each time the time interval has elapsed. The interval can be set by entering the desired time in the Start Time textbox. The application will stop displaying the message at the end of the set interval. If the program is closed
