Mathematical models have been useful in studying the dynamics of the nervous system and in developing more general models of human neural activity. The two major developments of theoretical and mathematical biology are the cellular (i.e., "granular") and the synapse-based (i.e., "nodular") levels. At the cellular level, morphological studies of neurons have required the use of computer-generated three-dimensional models to understand their functions. At the synapse level, a quantitative analysis of the ways that synapses transfer information has been aided by the development of a general mathematical theory of chemical synapses. Much of the remaining work at both levels has been concerned with the question of how different subsystems of the nervous system interact. Both levels are linked through the use of signal processing and statistical inference in a multiplicity of ways. "Toxic masculinity" is one of the worst phrases of the decade. It's used to describe everything from the misogynistic attitudes of some baseball players to the tendency for men to spend money and care little about others. It has, by now, come to cover a whole array of male behavior and attitudes that we want to change. The best way to define toxic masculinity is to describe a general stereotype.
