Assessment of asymptomatic bacteriuria in a pediatric medical center. Antibiotic prophylaxis for urinary tract infection (UTI) in infants and children is based on the presumption of a non-bacteriuric state at the time of most antibiotic administrations. The purpose of this study was to examine UTI in a group of patients who were taking antimicrobial agents for non-UTI purposes. This study was conducted in a university-affiliated, private, pediatric practice. Study patients were selected at random from among children 1 to 18 years of age who were taking antimicrobial agents for non-UTI reasons. Patients with UTI were excluded from the study. Urinalysis was performed on all patients with UTI or asymptomatic bacteriuria. Stool cultures were obtained from children who had UTI. Follow-up urine cultures were performed 1 month after completion of antibiotic treatment. Of 489 patients, 33 (6.7%) had bacteriuria. Eighteen patients had asymptomatic bacteriuria (4.1%). Girls had significantly higher incidence of bacteriuria than boys (p < 0.05). Q: SEO and PDF file for multiple language I need to add a PDF file to my website. My concern is SEO. Is it a good practice to add a PDF file with multiple language (English/French/Spanish)? Is it good to add a PDF file with language code for languages not in use by that user? A: A properly prepared PDF should be displayable in all languages used by the website. The PDF file should not be a problem in this regard. That said, you should have your PDFs translated for each target language. Do this by first translating the document into the language of the website, and then backtranslate (reverse translate) the document into the language of the target audience. You should use a translator tool like Poppler or LibreOffice to perform the translation. The two steps of translation will ensure that the viewer of the PDF will understand the content and context of the document. A: SEO is a unique beast and each page, PDF, and mobile device require a bit of a different approach when it comes to SEO. I do not recommend adding PDF's to your site if you do not have them hosted by yourself (you do not want to depend on the host and they might push you towards a host that does not care about SEO) and you do not have them locally. If you are considering doing so, look for an SEO friendly PDF converter instead of converting the PDF yourself. When it comes to online SEO, I do not think it would be a good idea to have some PDF's with alternate language (if you have no idea what the server is going to be then you might be into that whole XY problem you alluded to a while ago). This would be a much more complicated problem than you might think and would require much more than a one-time translation. I also think it would be risky to be putting content, specifically content that would be meaningful to a visitor, into a PDF that you intend to host yourself for SEO. That will be a nightmare to manage and not really work out. You will end up blocking content in some cases, in others you might get into trouble with the copyright holder and so on. I would say your best approach is to use a tool that supports all languages of your site (many of the more popular tools on the market work with more than one language), include translated content in HTML, add the PDF as a resource, then use a
