Category: Windows 7 Introduction PHPUnit provides a suite of tests that can be used to run the tests that are included with the framework. With all this test framework available to us, it can be a bit of a headache to find out which to use for what purpose. For example, there is a test that will determine if a test suite passed: `run(new PHPUnit_Framework_TestResult);` If that test suite has an F.E.E. it would be better to use this: `run();` The problem The main problem that we have all run into is determining how to know if a test suite passed. We can assume that a test suite with no errors would have passed. If that's not what we want, we can just make it pass. All we need to do is `addTest(new TestFoo('FooTest.php'));` ?> This will make the test pass. It may be convenient for us to have to use this method of "fixing" a failing test, but it's not very good practice. The Solution There are two ways that we can determine if a test suite passed. We can either check if a group of tests passed, or we can check to see if all the tests passed. Doing the first method will make more sense if the group of test cases are related. For example, if all the tests are being related to determine the correct output for a page. In this case, we would do something like the following: `addTest(new FooTest('`
