The

purpose of the alert may be to notify a user of the presence of a desired animal, such as a pet, or it may be to provide some sort of alarm to warn a user of danger, such as an approaching wild animal. Some of these devices are designed to be fixed to an animal or animal carrier so that the device continually detects the presence of the animal. One example of such a device is one that alerts when an animal falls asleep. Some of these fixed devices are also beamed so that the sensor is able to detect the presence of the animal from a distance. These fixed devices present a problem in that they do not have the ability to alert the user to the presence of an animal or to provide an alarm when the animal is detected at a location other than where the animal is being carried. When an animal is carried on an animal carrier, such as a collar or harness, it is desirable for the animal to have the opportunity to roam within a bounded area. For example, a dog that is an alert or aggressive dog may be kept within a yard or a window box to prevent it from escaping or causing damage to the property of others. With a fixed device, however, the presence of an alert animal is not detected unless the animal falls asleep or otherwise is placed in a position where the sensor detects the animal. In contrast, if the sensor itself is configured to be removed from the animal and allow the animal to roam freely, then this type of sensor is limited because it cannot be kept with the animal without attachment to the animal.require'minittest/autorun'

Theresa May has promised Tory MPs a 'final say' on the outcome of any Brexit deal as the prospect of a second EU referendum hangs in the air. Dismissing Jeremy Corbyn's call for a people's vote, the Prime Minister said there was 'no mandate for a second referendum at this time'. And she urged MPs to unite and support Theresa May's deal.

And she told the party a vote for any other option would leave Britain 'half in and half out of the EU'. But Ms May was unable to give any sign that the so-called 'Malthouse compromise' - agreed by Tory and Labour moderates - is the answer to the Brexit dilemma. 'Dividing' Britain And she rejected the idea that a no-deal Brexit would be a 'clean break' leaving Britain to negotiate with no involvement in the trade talks and having made a divorce deal with the EU at the end of negotiations. Ms May told the Labour party's conference in Brighton: "I want this Tory government to be able to deliver on the instruction given by the British people in the referendum. "But I am also clear that there is no mandate for a second referendum at this time. "Division and uncertainty are the worst enemies of our party and of our country. I know that and I will never seek to create a political crisis that could result in a crisis for this country." Tensions have been growing between the Conservatives and Labour following meetings between the former Brexit Secretary and Labour leader. And the Prime Minister told the BBC's Andrew Marr Show: "The politics of the second referendum are dividing our country. They are creating uncertainty
